Purpose: Civilian incident review, documentation, and pattern-analysis report for suspected directed-energy and remote-control crime complaints.

Summary

There appear to be several parts to the reported remote-control victimization process from a criminal perspective. The alleged goal of the attackers is not only to harm the victim, but also to avoid being identified, exposed, investigated, or prosecuted.

The following analysis is based on my own experiences, observations, and the patterns I believe many victims are reporting across the country.

First, I must say that I am proud to be American. I believe that may be one reason God chose me to walk this path, where I have experienced what can only be described as hate on steroids. Even after everything I have endured, I still believe in America, justice, and the responsibility of good men and women to protect innocent people.

1. Individual Responsibility and Criminal Choice

Each individual who participates in these types of attacks has made a choice. He or she made the choice to help psychologically and/or physically hurt another human being.

No one should be excused simply because the attacks are hidden, remote, technological, or difficult for the average person to understand. If a person participates in stalking, harassment, remote assault, psychological manipulation, physical injury, or helping others cover up the crime, that person should be viewed as part of the criminal operation.

2. Inaction, Complicity, and Failure to Protect

Due to the inaction of some leaders in national security, federal agencies, and local law enforcement, many victims believe these officials are being viewed as accomplices or complicit through failure to act.

Most of the criminal justice system is based on stopping crime, holding offenders accountable, and reducing recidivism. However, when victims report directed-energy assaults, remote harassment, acoustic attacks, or electronic torture and are ignored, dismissed, or redirected without proper investigation, the attackers appear to interpret that silence as permission.

To the perpetrators, the lack of response from national security, the FBI, CIA, and other agencies may appear to say:

“Go ahead. Keep remotely attacking them. Do not worry. We are not going to investigate. We are not going to help. We will deny it is happening. We will tell the world these victims are mentally ill. We will block them from resources and revenue.”

This lack of help for victims who report directed-energy assaults makes the system appear complicit in these crimes. Every day and night, alleged attackers continue to remotely attack civilians without fear of consequences.

In my own experience, I also believe these attacks have included malicious attempts to sabotage my organization, the organization created to help victims in this space. This reported sabotage has made it difficult to secure funding, obtain support, and establish a physical location where health care professionals could be hired to perform testing, documentation, and victim-support services.

This creates an even greater injustice. While victims continue to report suffering without access to proper testing or help, the very organization working to build those services is allegedly being blocked, undermined, or interfered with. In other words, those responsible have not been providing the needed help, while the organization built that help has faced repeated obstacles and sabotage.

Until the men and women in national security who are tasked with helping protect Americans step up, victims will continue to suffer. For those who say they did not have the funding, did not know, or did not understand, they should be replaced with men and women who do know, will do their jobs.

3. Step One — Character Assassination

The first step appears to be character assassination.

This may include making up lies, spreading rumors, exaggerating the truth, damaging the victim's reputation, and creating a false public image of the victim so that no one will believe him or her.

The goal is to isolate the victim. Once the victim is isolated, it becomes easier for attackers to continue the harassment, because family, friends, professionals, police, or the public may dismiss the victim before reviewing the facts.

This stage is important because if the victim cannot be believed, the crime can continue longer without accountability.

4. Step Two — Conditioning the Victim's Body

The second step appears to involve conditioning the victim's body so it can be more easily connected to or affected by remote systems.

Based on my experience, much of this appears to take place overnight while the victim is asleep, or while the victim is at rest. It seems that the more technical members of the team use these times to set up or operate energy-based equipment near the victim's living space.

In some cases, victims may suspect equipment is placed or directed from areas such as crawl spaces, floors, ceilings, walls, nearby apartments, vehicles, or other hidden locations. Victims may report sensations that feel like ionizing radiation, electroshocks, vibration, pulsing, heating, pressure, sound effects, or other energy-based assaults directed above or below the bedroom.

This part of the process is reported as physical conditioning, where the victim's body may become more sensitive to repeated remote attacks.

5. Step Three — Signal Programming and Remote Terror

After the conditioning stage, other teammates or coordinators may allegedly begin programming or controlling signals associated with the victim's body.

From computers, devices, or coordinated technology systems, these individuals may proceed to remotely terrorize the victim through 24/7 psychological and physical attacks.

Victims may report pain, sleep disruption, body shocks, sudden pressure, forced thoughts, voice harassment, emotional manipulation, fear programming, or repeated attempts to control the victim's daily behavior.

This stage appears to be designed to break the victim down physically, mentally, emotionally, financially, and socially.

6. Remote Hypnotism and Voice Technology

Another part of the reported process involves what may be described as remote hypnotism or command-based harassment.

Victims may report that attackers use voice weapons, long-range or short-range acoustic devices, artificial intelligence voices, or human voices to pressure the victim into obeying commands.

These voices may attempt to influence what the victim says, does, believes, fears, or avoids. In some cases, victims report being talked into confusion, anger, silence, shame, exhaustion, or harmful decisions.

This alleged technology may also be used to keep a victim asleep or in a controlled state even when he or she feels pain. Victims may report feeling unable to fully wake up, unable to respond normally, or unable to escape the attack while it is happening.

7. Hearing Interference and Access to the Victim's Environment

Victims may also report interference with hearing.

These alleged "human hackers" may attempt to affect the victim's hearing through the cochlea, sound pathways, acoustic devices, or other unknown technology. The victim may experience muffled hearing, tones, sounds, noise, pressure, or sudden hearing disruption.

One possible purpose of this reported hearing interference is to create an environment where another person or teammate can enter the victim's apartment, room, or living space without waking the victim.

This may be part of a larger pattern involving stalking, unlawful entry, surveillance, theft, tampering, or continued harassment.

8. Helpers, Catfish Teams, and Confusion Operations

Another major part of the alleged remote-control crime pattern involves helpers or catfish teams.

These are the people who help create chaos around the victim. Their role may be to keep the victim from knowing who is attacking them, where the attacks are coming from, what equipment is being used, how the attacks are happening, and why the victim is being targeted.

These helpers may include stalkers, neighbors, professionals, online actors, fake friends, fake romantic interests, or coordinated groups who mislead, distract, provoke, or manipulate the victim.

The catfish team may help cover the crime by creating false explanations, emotional confusion, social conflict, or staged events. This makes it harder for the victim to identify the attackers or explain the pattern clearly to police, doctors, family, or the public.

Crime Analysis Statement

From a criminal-analysis perspective, this reported pattern appears to involve more than one person and more than one method of attack. It may include psychological warfare, character assassination, acoustic harassment, suspected directed-energy exposure, remote manipulation, stalking, surveillance, sleep disruption, hearing interference, and coordinated deception.

The purpose appears to be control, isolation, intimidation, and concealment.

The victim is not only physically and psychologically harmed, but also placed in a position where proving the crime becomes extremely difficult. This is why proper documentation, incident reports, medical evaluation, pattern analysis, and law enforcement education are necessary.

Closing Statement

Victims of suspected directed-energy, acoustic, electronic, and remote-control crimes deserve to be heard, documented, and taken seriously. These reports should not be automatically dismissed. They should be reviewed with care, neutrality, and a commitment to public safety.

The failure to investigate allows alleged attackers to continue harming civilians. DEW Police and Direct Energy Weapons Agency, Inc. continue to document these reports, analyze patterns, and advocate for recognition, investigation, testing, treatment, and protection for victims.

Description of “Remote Control” of a Human

In this report, the term “remote control” of a human refers to the reported use of hidden, remote, psychological, acoustic, electronic, directed-energy, or technology-assisted methods to influence, pressure, manipulate, weaken, or interfere with a person’s body, mind, emotions, behavior, sleep, hearing, decision-making, or daily functioning without the person’s consent.

From a criminal-analysis perspective, “remote control” does not necessarily mean full control of a human being like a machine. It refers to an alleged pattern of coercive influence where attackers may attempt to break down the victim’s independence through repeated harassment, sleep disruption, fear, pain, confusion, voice harassment, surveillance, character assassination, and physical or neurological interference.

The purpose of this alleged conduct appears to be control, intimidation, isolation, and concealment. The victim may feel that his or her thoughts, body, environment, choices, and daily life are being interfered with by outside persons using hidden technology, coordinated stalking, psychological pressure, or energy-based methods.

In simple terms, “remote control” means the reported attempt to control or influence a victim from a distance without physical contact, consent, or accountability.
